According to this article, married couples in Japan must have the same family name. In almost all cases, this means the wife changes her name. Today, some couples would like to keep their own surnames.

In my opinion, people should be allowed to choose whether or not change their names when they marry.

In most marriages, both husband and wife work, so if one must change his or her last name, they will need to change their business cards, and various business-related paperwork.

Also, if the couple separates, and the woman decides to return to her original surname, it will be difficult for her children. They may feel depressed or embarrassed.
